When you work to help communities have the economic supports they need to thrive, you are also doing equitable sexual violence prevention. Economic supports are one of the critical protective factors against sexual violence. In communities with equitably distributed economic resources, financial stability, and increased access to generational and community wealth, it is less likely that people will experience violence.

People hold many intersectional social identities, such as race/ethnicity, disability, gender, and sexuality, which together affect the forms of oppression and inequality they face. Approaching sexual violence prevention (SVP) with an anti-oppression, intersectional lens is helpful for identifying root causes and creating more effective supports for communities that are most impacted. In Michigan, there is a critical need for such equity-focused attention on SVP in Black, Native/Indigenous/American Indian, LGBTQ+, and Disability communities*. The 2022 Michigan Community Sexual Violence Prevention Assessment (CSVPA), led by Michigan Public Health Institute (MPHI), was a first step to listen and learn from these core communities about what sexual violence looks like in their communities, how risk and protective factors for violence unequally affect them, and what their prevention resources and needs are. (For more information about the CSVPA process, visit Appendix A.)

This brief focuses on recommendations for strengthening economic supports in these communities as a key protective factor against SV.

For those unfamiliar with this idea, risk and protective factors make it more likely (risk factors) or less likely (protective factors) that individuals, communities, and societies will experience violence. Personal or relationship factors could include someone’s past experiences with violence, or a teen’s connection to school or a caring adult. Community or societal factors could include the lack of good-paying jobs in a neighborhood or widely held beliefs about violence. Each factor affects Black, Native, LGBTQ+, and Disability communities in Michigan in similar and unique ways depending on their diverse identities, histories, and contexts.

*Identity and language are very complicated. The authors of this report intentionally use terms endorsed by the project’s Advisory Council to describe the core communities and their members. We recognize that identity language is always evolving and that not all identity terms are captured here. As a reflection of the varied preferences within the disability community, we will use both person-first language (e.g., “people with disabilities”) and identity-first language (e.g., “disabled people”).
COMMUNITY-INFORMED RECOMMENDATIONS

The community-informed recommendations that follow include examples of the kinds of actions you can do to support this work. You can be part of a movement to end sexual violence by creating partnerships, educating policymakers, and strengthening programs to meet these community needs.

NOTED AT THE END OF EACH EXAMPLE are the specific communities where that action was supported by data from the assessment. Just because a core community is not listed does not necessarily mean that the example is not relevant or important for that core community; it simply means it was not mentioned by interviewees or found in the literature review that informed this assessment.

  + Encourage Tribal leadership to establish educational scholarship funds for Native community members. Native
Community-driven strategies and strong partnerships will help Michigan meet the needs of communities most impacted by sexual violence. We hope this information helps you to:

+ See how your work contributes to sexual violence prevention by building and strengthening community connectedness.
+ Expand current perspectives and explore new community-driven prevention solutions.
+ Center community-informed recommendations, like those outlined above, to guide SVP work.
+ Prioritize partnership with leaders, programs, organizations, and systems that serve under-resourced communities, specifically the Black, LGBTQ+, Native, and Disability communities.
